SAILORS SHOT IN PORTSMOUTH

Policeman Happens Along and a Lively Time Follows—Both Sailors Wounded.

ONE NEGRO KILLS ANOTHER

Man Who Started the Fight and Was Aggressor Is Promptly Shot Dead.

(Special to The Times-Dispatch.)
NORFOLK, VA., April 6.—Roy Wells is in the United States Naval Hospital here, suffering from a fractured thigh, caused by a bullet from the pistol of Norfolk County Officer J. C. Hubbard.

Wells, with a sailor companion, Charles Brooks, from the United States receiving ship Franklin, paid a visit to some dives in Queen Street, extended, Portsmouth. Both men carried pistols and shot up the street. Officer Hubbard was attracted by the shooting, and found Wells and Brooks, and placed them under arrest. The officer covered the men with his pistol, and after handcuffing them together called on A. S. Chase, a former police officer, to search them. Hubbard lowered his pistol, and as he did so Brooks opened fire, hitting his hand, sending a bullet by the ear of Hubbard and another one into Chase's arm, after which they sprang. Hubbard returned fire, and after a short run Wells went down, with a ball in his thigh, another one dropping Brooks, making a flesh wound in his thigh.

There were half a dozen witnesses, who say that Robertson was the aggressor. As he drew a knife and cut Ballard, the latter drew a pistol and fired three shots. One struck Robertson in his hand, another went through his heart, causing instant death. Ballard ran away immediately, and has not since been seen.

WHIMS OF THE IDLER

What Will Posterity Say of That Photograph of Yours?

We truly great men, who are so busy planting trees for future generations that we don't find time to support our own families, sometimes are profoundness in making our plans for the welfare of posterity.

For example, none of us quite know what is the most appropriate costume in which to have our pictures taken. Nor are all of us yet unborn. Unfortunately the artistic day of sartorial simplicity and scanty attire has passed. Moreover, some of us are not built for such costume. They are all of us fashioned for knickerbrockers or the Shakespearean doublet and hose, which apparently are designed only for those who have battened off the latest breakfast foods or the most modern mineral waters. From the middle of the nineteenth century down to the present year of our Lord, fashions have changed so fast that a hero of 1859 in a paper collar now looks like a po-white clerk from a bob-tailed village.

Nor are paper collars the only things that drag one down into the dregs of plebeian life. They are the most laughable human misfit. Take the noblest man you know to-day, and plunge him into the mire of the block of 1900. If he doesn't look like a crime against humanity then I'll call the man and the hat, too.

It is the photograph albums which show how hopelessly impossible it is to get one's self properly rigged up for posterity. Photographs somehow never suggest this antique and very quaint. The second they begin to show the first effects of time, they make their subject appear blatantly and shriekingly po-white—dead-common to a hopeless degree.

They represent one's clothes as a frigate shot at respectability which has missed the mark by a thousand yards.

If a woman were loving me and saw some of the photographs I had taken twenty years ago—yes, ten years ago—I would consider my cause more irretrievably lost than if conviction of a felony were laid at my doors. Far safer is it for one to let his sweetheart see him getting his hair cut than it is to give her a squint at his picture as wrought by a camera of half a decade ago.

Now the saddest part about it all is that the photographs we are having taken to-day will look just as luridly taken ten years hence, and the very pictures which were intended to immortalize us to such fine advantage will what antique furniture is to the garish instalment house stuff.

No matter how ugly grandpa was in real life, the old gent somehow looks aristocratic when he peeps out, almost like a specter from the glazed front of a daguerotype. The very cast which is the repository of his rapidly-fading physiognomy, has dignity about it and is more or less exclusive. Grandpa, as a flesh and blood actuality, may have been merely Toby-smitten, but, harnessed up in a black stock and with a swallow-tail coat that bucked up on the back of his neck until it reached the corner of his head, he looked like the king pin of the neighborhood. Quaint, indeed, the daguerotype creates that impression.

Not yet have I found a single man whose features, when preserved by this medium of portraiture, suggested the plebeian, and yet there must have been po-white folks even in the days of the daguerotype. The po-white, as well as the poor, we have always with us. Going back still further, we step into the era when scissors did the camera's work, and the silhouette artist blackened every man's appearance, if not his character. Quaint, indeed, are these long-tailed figures in jet paper, but they are never plebeian. So, too, they are grotesque rather than ridiculous. And it was the ugly man who got the most for his money when he had his silhouette cut, for the more rugged his features, the more accurate his likeness.

A jump backwards from the solemn silhouettes to the oil portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds eliminates all suggestion of any such thing as po-whiteness or even the mildly humorous in humanity. From these mellow hues we look down only on people who were splendidly patrician, or at least always had the air of being such. They always wore clothes that fitted—clothes that seemed harmonious and dignified and genteel. Sir Joshua, as he climbed the ladder of fame, became a pretty stiff charger, and it may be that his portraits, peculiarly speaking, represented the very best of the fittest. At any rate, one can't imagine anybody as being commonplace if he had one or two ancestors whose portraits were painted by Reynolds.

But to return to our mutton-chop photograph and its obnoxious faults. It may be, after all, that its precursors are dignified only because halloved by time. Retrospection is ever a kindly process if it is sufficiently retrospective. Who knows? Some day, you and I, viewed through our "photos," may be regarded as beautiful. Some mortal, to be born a hundred years hence, may, perhaps, gaze on that pie face of yours, and overlooking your colloid
